CHALLENGING 'PROCTORIAL CURFEW'

DU female students organise 'Gaaner Adda'

TIMES Report Dhaka

A group of Dhaka University (DU) students organised a late-night "Gaaner Adda" and "Muri Party" on Sunday to protest the recent restrictions, which have been dubbed the "proctorial curfew" on residential female students.

The night before, two students were barred from staying in non-residential areas of the campus after 10pm, with the university's proctorial team citing security concerns.

One of the protesters, Sakiba Sultana Bonna, joint convener of the Ruqayyah Hall Chhatra Dal committee, said the protest was "not political" but aimed at inspiring others to stand up for themselves.

Bonna, a student from the dance department, said, "As adults, we do not need the proctorial team's approval to stay outside, and providing a guardian's number is unnecessary."

TWO STUDENTS WERE BARRED FROM STAYING IN NON-RESIDENTIAL AREAS OF THE CAMPUS AFTER 10PM, WITH THE UNIVERSITY'S PROCTORIAL TEAM CITING SECURITY CONCERNS.

Ashrefa Khatun, spokesperson for the Bangladesh Ganatantrik Chhatra Sangsad, announced the "Gaaner Adda" and "Muri Party" in a Facebook post. According to the organisers, the event included activists from several student organisations alongside general students.

The protesters said they faced cyberbullying after posting their pictures on social media. Earlier, Israt Jahan, a student from the Disaster Management and Vulnerability Studies Department, said two proctorial team members stopped her from entering Mall Chattar at 10:38pm, citing "higher orders" that prohibit female students from non-residential areas after 10pm.

According to her, the proctor explained that the rule was implemented "for security reasons" and that the team "would be held accountable in case of any incident" when she inquired further.

Later, DU Proctor Saifuddin Ahmed expressed regret over the Mall Chattar incident, calling it a "misunderstanding" regarding student entry, according to a press release.
